Fayre is an archaic spelling of fair, used mostly from the 15th to the 17th century. This spelling is now confusingly used for both fair and fare, the latter in the sense of 'food and drink'. In itself, the word means a gathering of stalls and amusements for public entertainment. The alternate spelling is an old-fashioned affectation and is used in order to remind revelers and participants of medieval fayres and markets. Fairs are also known by many different names around the world, such as agricultural show, carnival, county fair, exhibition or state fair, festival, market and show. Flea markets and auto shows are sometimes incorporated into a fair. Activities at fairs vary widely. Some are important showcases for businessmen in agricultural, pastoral or horticultural districts because they present opportunities to display and demonstrate the latest machinery on the market.
