About Us

In the modern world, the usage of rubber, both synthetic and natural—is innumerable. It is considered highly sustainable due to its renewable quality. The demand for natural rubber is high in the market. Asia produces the highest amount of natural rubber in the world. In India, Kerala is the largest producer of rubber followed by Tripura. India is the second largest consumer of rubber, but a 'distant second' (to China). There is vast potential for further development of tyre and other rubber-based industries in India. Hence India is well-poised to be a hub of the global rubber industry. Rubber is already an important raw material for a number of industries but natural rubber is in short supply all over the world. In India too, the production falls short of demand. The Indian Rubber Board and Indian State Governments have to explore ways and means to expand rubber cultivation in new areas and increase productivity. Private investment partnerships being proposed in this prospective can be a useful tool to state governments. Existing Rubber Plantations in the Northeast are producing good annual latex yields. TVB and our private sector partners hope our partnership developments can further add additional land under rubber cultivation. The favorable climatic conditions found in the Northeast are suitable for the flourishing growth of rubber trees and nearly 4,50,000 hectares of the region's arable lands has already been marked for rubber farming. Farmers in...
